

THE BRICS AGAINST THE WEST?

ZAKI LAIDI

N°11 - HORS SERIE, NOVEMBRE 2011

<http://www.ceri-sciences-po.org>

CERI
STRATEGY
PAPERS

SciencesPo.

CERI
CNRS

The BRICS Against the West?

Zaki LAÏDI

The author is Research Professor at the Centre d'Etudes Européennes de Sciences Po. His most recent books include: Le monde selon Obama (Stock, 2010); Europe as a Risk Averse Power. A Hypothesis (Garnet Policy Brief, 2010); Norms over Force. The Enigma of European Power (Palgrave Macmillan, 2008).

Whether we like it or not, the BRICS are now part of the global geopolitical landscape. It remains to be seen whether this evolving geopolitical acronym – since, in 2011, South Africa was added to the initial group consisting of Brazil, India, Russia, and China – is able to structurally impact the global system¹. Structural impact refers to the ability to shape one's identity or future configuration. Regarding identity this consists of proposing, for example, a competing global narrative to that of the West ("the world is multipolar and state sovereignty is one of its essential features"). With regard to balance of power, it involves changing the agenda, direction, standing requirements, and collective decision-making of the international community in sensitive areas (multilateral trade negotiations, International Monetary Fund reform, Security Council and United Nations reform, completion of climate negotiations, implementation of the resolution on the responsibility to protect). The BRICS' impact can be evaluated based on the degree of political coherence among them, as well as their capacity to influence the international system. This article will from the outset assume that the BRICS form a heterogeneous coalition of often competing powers that share a common fundamental political objective: to erode Western hegemonic claims by protecting the principle which these claims are deemed to most threaten, namely the political sovereignty of states. The BRICS form a coalition of sovereign state defenders. While they do not seek to form an anti-Western political coalition based on a counter-proposal or radically different vision of the world, they are concerned with maintaining their independence of judgment and national action in a world that is increasingly economically and socially interdependent². They consider that state sovereignty trumps all, including, of course, the political nature of its underpinning regimes. Thus the BRICS – even the democratic ones – fundamentally diverge from the liberal vision of Western countries³. There is no better evidence of this today than the BRICS' opposition to any outside intervention in the countries affected by the Arab Spring.

¹ Van der Merwe, J.P., "BRIC becomes BRICS." TradeInvest South Africa, 27 January 2011. <http://www.tradeinvestsa.co.za/feature_articles/222186.htm>

² John Ikenberry cogently notices this point in the conclusion of his last book Liberal Leviathan: The Origins, Triumph, Crisis, and Transformation of the American World Order (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 2011).

Yet this defensively strong coalition remains weak on the offensive precisely because the sovereign states that form it pursue narrow national objectives. Since they are very distrustful of one another for a number of reasons, of which some are historical (Sino-Russian and Sino-Indian rivalry), the BRICS have trouble interpreting sovereignty as anything other than a zero-sum game, including among themselves. This narrow attachment to sovereignty is both their strength and their great weakness.

The BRICS: a product of globalization and the Iraq war

The BRICS find themselves in two dynamics that are progressing in confluence: one is economic, and the other is more strategic. The economic dynamic is obviously the product of globalization. It is the one that led investment bank Goldman Sachs to note for the first time in November 2001 – two months after September 11 – the emergence of four countries (Brazil, India, China and Russia) with economic growth rates that have now surpassed those of the G7 countries⁴. The Goldman Sachs study highlighted the gap between the official measure of wealth (nominal GNP) and wealth relative to purchasing power (purchasing power parity). According to the first measure, the BRICS only account for 8% of global GNP. With the second, they reach 23%⁵. Ten years after the first BRICS study, the figures largely confirm initial forecasts. Their contribution to global growth is impressive: 36%⁶. The estimate for 2020 is 49%, meaning they will collectively account for a third of global GNP⁷. The BRICS are heirs to the globalized economy and accordingly staunch supporters of an open economy and determined adversaries of any economic protectionism, especially since the 2008-2009 financial crisis. The fact that the concept of BRICS was created by an investment bank, while that of the Third World was formed by a demographer (Alfred Sauvy) reveals how much economic globalization has come to shape geopolitical representations.

While the BRICS are the product of economic globalization, they are not limited to it. At the same time – and this is what makes them original – they are in a way the product of September 11 and the war in Iraq. The latter highlighted the superpower of the United States along with the inability of the rest of the world to

³ They can nonetheless assert with some justification that the United States, for example, remains fundamentally sovereignist despite its liberal orientation, as evidenced by its action in multilateral institutions and negotiations. For example, the U.S. is largely responsible for the current deadlock in WTO negotiations, or for the Security Council's total lack of condemnation of Israel on the settlement issue.

⁴ "Building Better Global Economic BRICs." Global Investment Research—November 2001 Global Economics. Paper N°66, Goldman Sachs. <http://www2.goldmansachs.com/ideas/brics/building-better-doc.pdf>.

⁵ Idem.

⁶ Wilson, Dominic; Kelston, Alex L.; Swarnali, Ahmed. "Is this the 'BRICs Decade'?" BRICs Monthly 10/03, 20 May 2010. Available at: <http://www2.goldmansachs.com/ideas/brics/brics-decade.html>.

⁷ Idem.

oppose it⁸. The first Gulf War in 1991 had already made this imbalance evident, but the stakes were different at the time. Whether the 1991 war was a pretext to reaffirm the U.S. presence in the Middle East does not change the fact that Iraq had indeed violated the sovereignty of a state that was independent and recognized as such by the international community. The context in 2003 was very different. In this case, the political sovereignty of the Iraqi state was challenged on the basis of a redoubtable principle: preemptive war⁹. The Bush Doctrine, which propounded preemption, was deeply traumatic for all the emerging countries. They more or less explicitly reasoned that the United States would not hesitate to use force against any country that might thwart its interests. The BRICS themselves were obviously not directly exposed to this kind of threat. But as powers emerging on the global scene and claiming influence on it, they had to be wary of the Bush administration's armed messianic thrust. These concerns were somewhat dispelled with the advent of the Obama administration, but the wariness remains. The Brazilians for instance had expressed concern about the United States' Plan Colombia in 2009¹⁰, and once again raised the issue of the purpose of U.S. air bases in the Amazon during President Obama's visit to Brasilia in 2011¹¹. Brasilia wanted to ensure that these bases were not logistical support for possible American military interventions outside of Colombia¹². Moreover, Brazilian diplomats constantly refer back to the Iraqi case, especially to justify their country's refusal to pursue sanctions against Iran. For Brazil, as for the other emerging countries, the application of sanctions is but the prelude to war¹³.

The political crystallization that led to the emergence of the BRICS occurred in 2003, even if it was chronologically preceded by the creation of IBSA (India, Brazil, South Africa). In January 2003, at the inauguration of the new Brazilian President Lula, South African President Mbeki pitched to his counterpart the idea of creating a group comprising Brazil, South Africa and India, to engage in a dialogue with the G8 countries ahead of the June Evian Summit, to which these three countries had been invited by Jacques Chirac less than two months after the invasion of Iraq¹⁴. Two topics were on the agenda: the Iraq war and WTO multilateral negotiations. This initiative was very favorably received by both India and Brazil since, no sooner had the Evian Summit ended than the three countries met again in Brasilia to sign the declaration to create IBSA¹⁵. The three countries portrayed themselves as multiethnic, multicultural, and democratic emerging ⁸ Pape, Robert A. "Soft Balancing against the United States." International Security Vol.30, n°1 (2005): 7-45.

⁹ Jervis, Robert. "Understanding the Bush doctrine." Political Science Quarterly Vol. 118, n° 3 (Fall 2003): 365-88.

¹⁰ For more details on this issue, see the revelations made by Wikileaks: "Brasil recuanosataquesaoacordoColômbia-EUA, diztelegrama; leiaemingles." Folha.com, 4 January 2011. Available at: <http://www.folha.uol.com.br/>.

¹¹ Interview. Itamaraty, May 2011. Brasilia.

¹² Idem.

¹³ Hillary Clinton and Celso Amorim joint press conference in Brasilia, 4 March 2010. Available at: http://brazil.usembassy.gov/joint_amorim_clinton.html.

¹⁴ Figueire de Souza, Francisco. "IBSA: A Brazilian Perspective." Emerging Powers: India, Brazil and South Africa (IBSA) and the Future of South-South Cooperation. Special Report. Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars. August 2009. 8-13. Available at: <http://www.wilsoncenter.org/sites/default/files/brazil.IBSAemergingpowers.pdf>.

¹⁵ IBSA. "Brasilia Declaration." 6 June 2003. Available at: http://www.ibsa-trilateral.org/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=48&Itemid=27.

powers¹⁶. The BRICS obviously could not claim to share a common orientation with regard to the nature of the Russian and Chinese regimes. They were not bound by democracy, but by the desire to democratize the international system¹⁷. The idea was that the regional hegemons cooperate to pool their strength in the various multilateral negotiating forums¹⁸.

This new alliance did not take long to politically manifest itself in a forceful and spectacular way at the 2003 WTO summit in Cancun. No political player explicitly referred to the BRICS at the time since Russia was not, and still is not, a WTO member¹⁹. Nevertheless, at the conference, three BRICS (India, China and Brazil), with the assistance of other emerging countries – after care was taken to exclude Australia – joined forces to scuttle the Doha round agreement that the Europeans and Americans had secretly prepared. This blockade stemmed from these three countries' refusal to ratify a reduction in American and European agricultural subsidies that was considered patently insufficient by emerging countries. But the opposition rapidly politicized. At the purely trade-related level, India and China were reluctant to reach an agreement simply because they did not want to liberalize their industrial sectors any faster or further. They seized on the insufficient Euro-American concessions on agricultural subsidies as a pretext to block an agreement. Brazil's position was different: it had a much greater interest than India or China in reaching an agreement because the liberalization of the European and American agricultural markets was a top political priority. In addition to deeming Euro-American concessions insufficient, Brazil was not unhappy to show Western countries that emerging countries were no longer willing to accept WTO governance based on preliminary agreement between the United States and the European Union²⁰. Thus, India, Brazil, and China did not share the same trade interests. At the political level, however, they benefitted from ending the Euro-American condominium over the WTO. Western countries underestimated this aspect by writing off the alliance between Brazil, China, and India as only circumstantial, given their different interests within the international trade system. This alliance did in fact prove to be substantively circumstantial, but nonetheless had significant political consequences to the extent that it helped to change WTO governance. It may be said that the WTO has become much ¹⁶ "All three of these countries, besides being developing, are plural, multicultural, multiethnic, multilingual, multi-religious, and share elements of a common economic and political history". According to Indian ambassador Singh, cited in: Carpenter, Carey. "Global Governance South-South Economic Relations and Foreign Policy Strategies." Emerging Powers: India, Brazil and South Africa (IBSA) and the Future of South-South Cooperation. Special Report, August 2009: 4. Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars. Available at: <http://www.ipc-undp.org/ipc/doc/ibsa/papers/ibsa2.pdf>.

¹⁷ "Countries like Brazil, China, India, South Africa and a few others are the "new kids on the block" among global players that shape international relations. They legitimately aspire to greater participation in international institutions, which still suffer from a "democratic deficit." Global decisions can no longer be made without listening to their voices." Cited in: Amorim, Celso. "Let's Hear From the New Kids on the Block." New York Times, 14 June 2010.

¹⁸ Beri, Ruchita. "IBSA Dialogue Forum: An Assessment." Strategic Analysis Vol. 32, n° 5, September 2008: 809-831. Available at: <http://www.ipc-undp.org/ipc/doc/ibsa/papers/ibsa11.pdf>.

Alden, Chris Vieira, Marco Antonio. "The New Diplomacy of the South: South Africa, Brazil, India and Trilateralism." Third World Quarterly Vol. 26, n° 7, 2005: 1077-1095.

¹⁹ Celso Amorim underscores the role of the Cancun conference in the political process of building the BRICS in: "Let's Hear From the New Kids on the Block." New York Times, 14 June 2010.

²⁰ For more details on this case, see: Laïdi, Zaki. "Après Cancun: l'OMC en danger." Critique Internationale n° 31, October 2003: 33-41.

more democratic, and the Europeans and Americans are evidently no longer the only key players. The failure of the 2008 negotiations, which could have led to the completion of the Doha round, demonstrated the ambivalence of these two results. On one hand it confirmed the new position of emerging countries in the multilateral trade system, since India (and the United States) was the source of opposition to finalizing the agreement. On the other hand India and China's refusal to reach an agreement thwarted the interests of Brazil, which remains committed to a successful conclusion of negotiations²¹.

The Cancun experience had great political significance because it revealed the emerging countries' capacity to agree on a defensive political agenda in relation to the West, despite their diverging long-term interests. Two different dynamics thus gradually converged: at one end IBSA, the product of classical coalition-building among certain emerging states to advance South-South cooperation, and at the other BRICS, which began as a title invented by an investment bank, but then gradually built itself into a political coalition. The BRICS have acquired much greater political visibility than IBSA, but this is certainly not due to greater institutionalization. It is quite the contrary. While IBSA produced six regular ministerial meetings among its members beginning in 2003, the first BRICS summit did not take place until Russia took the initiative in 2009. The political recognition of BRICS is greater than that of IBSA simply because the former group includes China and Russia. While IBSA brings together mid-sized emerging powers, BRICS is a much more political group that includes two permanent members of the Security Council, three nuclear powers, and two non-democratic powers. BRICS has been much more difficult to institutionalize than IBSA precisely because the former's ability to develop a common agenda has been, and continues to be, more difficult.

In any event, the economic and financial crisis in 2008-2009 affirmed the prominent role played by emerging countries in the international system more than ever before. Without them, the recession would have been deeper. This fact substantiated what Goldman Sachs forecasted a decade ago: the huge growth potential of these countries. Accordingly, a whole series of demands made by the BRICS, such as the democratization of the international system, were echoed and materialized in the G20. The BRICS nonetheless view the creation of this new club with ambiguity. While it offers the advantage of opening the system by reorienting the global balance of power in a direction more favorable to emerging countries, it also dissolves their specific identity. That is the central issue: how can the BRICS justify their existence as such when so many other emerging powers exist in the world, such as Mexico in Latin America, Turkey in the Middle ²¹ "Les principales concessions des États-Unis dans ce cycle concernent l'agriculture. Cela peut intéresser le Brésil. Mais la Chine et l'Inde ne trouveront politiquement optimal de réduire encore leurs tarifs que si leurs exportateurs se voient offrir des tarifs qui les incitent à soutenir un accord" [The United States' main concessions in this round relate to agriculture. This is of interest to Brazil. However, China and India will only consider it politically optimal to further cut their tariffs if their exporters are offered tariffs conducive to their supporting an agreement.] Baldwin, Richard. "OMC: Obama veut-il un accord ?" [WTO: does Obama want an agreement], Telos, 10 May 2011. Available at: www.telos-eu.com.

East, and Indonesia in Asia²²? Upon its creation, IBSA had emphasized the multiethnic, multicultural, and democratic character of its members. This definition cannot be applied to the BRICS. One might assume that the BRICS draw their legitimacy from the fact that they bring together regional powers that have set their political ambitions on the international scene. But in this case, why not include Turkey? In the end, are the BRICS just creating a form of emerging aristocracy looking to be coopted by developed countries to the detriment of rival countries? Is this but a coalition of contenders for a permanent seat on the Security Council? In attempting to answer these questions, it becomes apparent that the answers are not so simple and that the BRICS must reckon with undeniable internal contradictions.

The BRICS and the succession of DSK

The collective weakness of the BRICS came to the fore during the great maneuvering that occurred in the wake of the unexpected opening to succeed Dominique Strauss-Kahn as head of the IMF. At first, all the BRICS agreed to reject – and legitimately so – the European monopoly over leading the IMF²³. However, some of them, and especially China and Brazil, were led to pursue narrow national calculations that created a real paradox, which was to withhold support for the only declared candidate from an emerging country: the candidate from Mexico. For instance, the Chinese knew that a Chinese candidacy was premature and unacceptable to everyone. They therefore had the choice to either support another candidate selected by emerging countries or secure the number two IMF position as well as a rapid increase in China's voting rights²⁴. They chose the second option, which has partially materialized since Mrs. Lagarde took office. Brazil faced the same dilemma. It did not have a national candidate and could not have one at a time when it was seeking to lead the FAO. Brazil logically should have settled on the Mexican Carstens' candidacy, which virtually all the Latin American countries supported. However, one must account for the rivalry between Brazil and Mexico, and the Mexican candidate's identification with American neoliberal orthodoxy²⁵. It would therefore appear that China and ²² Jim O'Neill, who coined the term BRIC, told the BBC it was a mystery as to why South Africa had been invited to participate in their meeting: "South Africa is small compared to these countries. South Africa is about half a percent of global GDP. And there are other economies which have much more justification if they were to really look at similar potential to the BRICS. Turkey, Indonesia, Mexico, Korea, even Saudi Arabia, Poland. I don't really understand why the Chinese and the others agreed to it." In "BRIC summit ends in China with plea for more influence." BBC, 14 April 2011. Available at: <http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/world-asia-pacific-13076229>. While this observation is economically pertinent, it is politically naïve in the sense that the thought process of the BRICS is fundamentally political. South Africa's accession allows the BRICS to include Africa and thus strengthen their international legitimacy.

²³ "This requires abandoning the obsolete unwritten convention that requires that the head of the IMF be necessarily from Europe. We are concerned with public statements made recently by high-level European officials to the effect that the position of Managing Director should continue to be occupied by a European." In "Statement by the IMF Executive Directors Representing Brazil, Russia, India, China and South Africa on the Selection Process for Appointing an IMF Managing Director." Press Release No. 11/195, May 24, 2011. Available at: <http://www.imf.org/external/np/sec/pr/2011/pr11195.htm>.

²⁴ For more on Beijing's support for Lagarde's candidacy, see "In Beijing, Lagarde Backs Bigger Say for China at IMF", New York Times, 9 June 2011.

²⁵ Brazilians are among the most hostile to the Fed's monetary policy, which is conducive to speculative capital flows to them. However, the situation was more complex with regard to the DSK succession case. The Brazilian representative to the IMF and the Brazilian Central Bank Governor seemed to favor Brazilian support for the Mexican candidacy. The Minister of Finance apparently made the decision to support Mrs. Lagarde, since the president did not get involved in the matter at all. According to Valor Economico, 30 June 2011.

Brazil approached Mrs. Lagarde's candidacy with a national agenda that was partly at odds with the search for a common candidate. The lack of time was officially cited to justify the absence of a common candidacy. But that was not the whole picture²⁶. In any case, the BRICS were not able to either put forward a common candidate or support the Mexican candidate who was supported by all of Latin America, with the exception of Brazil. This happened because, once again, these countries part ways as soon as power games place them in competition with one another. They have no problem collectively contesting Western dominance in world affairs. By the same token, they have no difficulty individually getting along with this same West to secure a particular national advantage, even at the cost of weakening the collective position of emerging countries. In the end, "the differences among the BRICS largely exceed their areas of convergence"²⁷. The best way to see this more clearly is to analyze a number of national strategies pursued by some of its members.

Russia: an atypical actor in the club

We will begin with Russia, the BRICS' most atypical actor. It is not an emerging power, strictly speaking, but rather a former superpower eager to regain a part of the political status it lost in the aftermath of the Cold War. To this end, Russia can draw on several assets. One is its legacy as a great world power under the tsars and the communists. This is a significant asset because it makes it much easier for Russia than for the other global players to project itself on the global stage, to hold a view on most key issues, to have a substantial diplomatic corps, and to uninhibitedly voice its views on the world stage. These assets would of course lose their relevance in the absence of material power, but there is always a time lag between the loss of power and of its formal attributes. Compared to the other BRICS, Russia holds an ambivalent, or even ambiguous position. The BRICS form a coalition that allows Russia to exist in a broader group when interacting with the West. It is no coincidence that Moscow was most willing to politicize the BRICS at a time when relations with Washington were deteriorating²⁸. Unlike the other BRICS, Russia is a global power without being a genuine regional power, and it seeks to mitigate its isolation by forming coalitions with other actors. Just like the others, however, it sees this group as a means to multi-lateralize its power in all the areas where its position is vulnerable. On the other hand it is careful not to play the joint card in areas where it has particular assets. For example, Moscow is anxious to ensure the G8 continues to function independently of the G20 even if that no longer makes much sense. Moscow seeks to protect its status as privileged partner of the U.S., be it to the detriment of other BRICS. Russia therefore has no interest in increasing the number of permanent members in the Security Council. It could calculate that the entry of Brazil or India might help to counterbalance the West or even China, of which Moscow remains deeply distrustful. This type of calculation is always risky though, because it is difficult to anticipate the behavior of states. What is certain is that Russia sees its status as permanent member of the Security Council as one of its principal assets next to its nuclear power. Its economic and demographic positions are much weaker. As a rentier state, its vision of the international economic system is warped by the very nature of its economy, which is based on the value of hydrocarbons. Its interest in joining the WTO attests to this. Like other rentier states, Russia only has a limited interest in complying with trade rules. Its preoccupying demographic decline further contributed to casting serious doubts on the BRICS concept applying to Russia at all. Again, Moscow only joins the BRICS on sovereignty-related issues, and even then, only if the BRICS agree on what they mean by sovereignty. Moscow received no support (or condemnation either) from the BRICS when it decided to invade Abkhazia and Southern Ossetia in 2008, despite these two regions being located within Georgia's internationally recognized borders. It notably did not elicit a response from China, which is extremely stringent about respecting the territorial integrity of internationally recognized states.

²⁶ According to the Indian Minister of Finance: "We are working together with the BRICS countries. It is difficult to say at right this moment because there is a divergence of views in respect of different candidates." Cited in "India: Not backing Lagarde for IMF job." Cape Times, 7 June 2011. Available at: <http://www.capetimes.co.za/india-not-backing-lagarde-for-imf-job-1.1080076>. Also see: "The IMF succession – disunity among the BRICs." The Economist, 10 June 2011.

²⁷ For a sober assessment of the performances of the BRICS made by these countries' representatives, see: "BRICS: Shaping the New Global Architecture." Woodrow Wilson Center for Scholars. Available at: <http://www.wilsoncenter.org/event/brics-shaping-the-new-global-architecture>.

²⁸ "There is no reason to doubt that the economic potential of the new centers of global economic growth will inevitably be converted into political influence and will strengthen multipolarity." Vladimir V. Putin, President of the Russian Federation, at the Wehrkunde Conference in Munich, 10 February 2007. Available at: http://archive.kremlin.ru/eng/speeches/2007/02/10/0138_type82912type82914type82917type84779_118123.shtml.

The BRICS and the Arab revolutions

This stringency towards sovereignty has increased in a striking way since the beginning of the Arab Spring. At the United Nations, the BRICS formed a united front against the Western countries to prevent a vote on resolutions likely to breach the sovereignty of repressive states. Granted, they all voted for Resolution 1970, which placed sanctions on Libya. Several weeks later, however, they all abstained (with the exception of South Africa) during the decisive vote on resolution 1973, which paved the way for NATO's military intervention. At first the BRICS abstentions were considered a form of progress towards relativizing state sovereignty on the basis of the responsibility to protect²⁹. The West's political optimism proved to be quite premature though. In one way or another, all of the BRICS expressed the view that NATO had overstepped the rights created by resolution 1973 in Libya, and they feared a repeat of this pattern in Syria. At the same time, they did not offer a single alternative solution³⁰. They just decided to staunchly oppose a vote on any resolution that might undermine Syrian sovereignty. To justify this attitude, on 15

²⁹ The head of Brazilian diplomacy recently affirmed that his country's abstention on resolution 1973 was akin to a "caution" signal. The big question is what this signal meant: caution to the Libyan regime, or caution to the West, which might be tempted to move too swiftly and too strongly. He probably meant a combination of the two. See his interview in O Estado de Sao Paulo, 17 July 2011.

³⁰ "Brazil will not accept a document that is identical to the one that was passed against Libya and that led to airstrikes", Declaration from the Brazilian Minister of Foreign Affairs, cited in: Folha de Sao Paulo, 10 June 2011.

June 2011, the head of Brazilian diplomacy explained to the Chamber of Deputies that the big difference between Libya and Syria was that “Syria had demonstrated its willingness to engage in dialogue and pursue electoral reform”³¹. Syria was deemed more reasonable than Libya even while the Western approach to the latter was condemned. Yet when the West used the Libyan precedent to argue that it was futile to believe in the Syrian regime’s ability to reform, the same Brazilian Minister of Foreign Affairs retorted: “Libya is starting to become more amenable to a cease-fire, to the monitoring of a cease-fire, and to responding to the demonstrators’ demands”³². Here again, this development – itself debatable – was not interpreted to the credit of NATO, which forced the Libyan regime to make concessions through its intervention. Even if the optimistic prognosis on the Damascus regime’s willingness to reform has been completely contradicted by the facts, the BRICS continue to oppose any resolution that might even remotely resemble resolution 1973, which is not even the West’s goal in this case. They are overplaying their card, so to speak, by jettisoning the idea of sanctions. In other words, the BRICS are refusing to vote for the equivalent of Libyan resolution 1970, for which they had unanimously voted. Yet they have not put forward a convincing explanation to justify this refusal, besides the fear of getting caught up in a cycle à la Libya that they seem to retrospectively regret not blocking. They merely say no to Western states without being capable of proposing a single alternative solution. This does not mean that their attitude is of no consequence to the Security Council’s balance of power. The Security Council’s presidential declaration of August 3rd 2011 completely satisfied Brazil, which had proposed such an approach since June³³. That being said, the worsening situation in Syria has led Brazil to shift its position midway between the West and the two implacable countries, which are Russia and China³⁴.

China: the BRICS as fulcrum of a global strategy

The second actor among the BRICS with a particular status is China. It is naturally an emerging power in the full meaning of the term. But it is also far from being the most emergent of the emerging powers. It has the ambition of a great power that purely and simply aims to become the principal challenger to U.S. power through pacific means. One of Beijing’s main objectives is to accordingly form a privileged partnership with the United States. In this perspective, China seeks to reduce the number of actors likely to thwart, limit, or relativize the centrality of its relationship with the United States. This objective does not preclude the development of more or less structured alliances with other actors. China’s strategy towards the BRICS stems from this perspective: play the game of integrating into the capitalist system without assuming the political consequences. The fact that China’s BRICS partners have different political

³¹ Folha de Sao Paulo, 16 June 2011.

³² Cited in O Estado de Sao Paulo, 17 July 2010.

³³ O Estado de Sao Paulo, 21 June 2011.

³⁴ See the interview with the Brazilian Foreign Minister in: O Globo, 7 August 2011.

systems from its own – most prominently because they are democratic – constitutes an additional asset for China, precisely because it allows China to demonstrate to the West that stringent attachment to sovereignty is in no way linked to the nature of political systems. In other words, if China refuses the slightest interference in its internal affairs, especially for anything related to human rights, it is not because it is not democratic, but rather because it considers the protection of sovereignty to be crucial to a stable international order. BRICS membership thus allows Beijing to share its sovereignist approach. As is the case with Russia though, an alliance with other sovereignist states does not imply a willingness to share its assets of power with them. This explains why China is one of the states most hostile to what could be called a democratization of the international system that might go beyond a greater recognition of its own rights within this system³⁵. An example is its opposition to increasing the number of permanent members of the Security Council. This is almost a strategic objective for China to the extent that the principal beneficiary of the democratization of the UN's system would be India, which also happens to be a BRICS member that enjoys U.S. support for its claim to a seat. As a result, the BRICS are a curious coalition, wherein members seek to neutralize each other in the most strategic areas of power. In a recent interview, the head of Brazilian diplomacy recognized that China was most reticent to reforming the Security Council. He added, not without humor: "China is not against reform per se, but it does not want to increase the number of countries with veto rights"³⁶. In short, China does not have anything against Brazil, but it also does not have any reason to give Brazil a gift.

As a strategic power that is intent on rivaling the United States, China is naturally an economic power with a GNP that is projected to surpass that of the United States at the nominal level in 2025. By dint of the simple fact that it has become the second greatest economic power in the world, China has seen its economic relations with the other BRICS significantly increase. China is the primary trade partner of Brazil, India, and South Africa. The interdependence among BRICS is thereby considerably deepening³⁷. This development should be interpreted with caution, however. The closer economic ties among the BRICS have more to do with additional bilateral agreements than with any integration among these countries. For all the BRICS, the region remains the preferred level for economic integration processes. Moreover, China's rising economic power is a cause for concern among its partners, and especially for Brazil. The latter is worried about Chinese inroads, which it seeks to counter by strengthening economic integration within South America³⁸.

³⁵ Celso Amorim deliberately overlooks this point when he says: "The arrival of the BRICS is revolutionizing the global balance of power by making it more multipolar and more democratic". Amorim, Celso. "Ser radical é tomar as cruzeiras." Carta Capital, 25 April 2011. Available at: <http://www.cartacapital.com.br/economia/ser-radical-e-tomar-as-cruzeiras>. Cf. my answer to him "Os Brics e o novo equilíbrio mundial", Valor Econômico, 27 May 2011.

³⁶ O Estado de São Paulo, 17 July 2011.

³⁷ In 2001, Chinese exports to India, Russia and Brazil did not exceed 3 billion dollars each. In 2009, Chinese exports to these three countries respectively reached 30, 17, and 14 billion dollars. In less than 10 years, Chinese exports to India have thus increased tenfold. Source: World Bank.

³⁸ According to Dilma Rousseff, "regional integration is the best way to strengthen Brazil's position with regard to the Asian products that are inundating the region." Cited in La Folha, 29 July 2011.

Brazil: the BRICS as an identity support

This brings us to Brazil, which is unquestionably one of the central BRICS actors. Under the leadership of Lula and his Minister of Foreign Affairs Celso Amorim, Brazil played a significant role in the emergence of the BRICS. As mentioned earlier, it was a driving force in forming the Cancun front. More recently, with Turkey, it was central to a political maneuver to counter the Americans with regard to Iran by attempting to negotiate a trilateral agreement with Teheran on nuclear waste reprocessing. Brazil sees the BRICS as an intermediary political circle in between the West – and particularly the United States, with which it enjoys close relations – and Latin America, which forms its natural economic and political sphere of influence. The complementarity of Brasilia's objectives is expressed in the fact that Lula both centrally integrated Brazil into the BRICS and crucially contributed to the creation of UNASUR. However, this activism has reached its limits. In a recent declaration on foreign affairs, the head of Brazilian diplomacy explicitly referred to IBSA and did not mention the BRICS, even with reference to Syria³⁹. In another statement, he emphasized that the nature of Brazilian power was different from that of China and Russia⁴⁰. This omission is not fortuitous. Brazil now understands that China is pursuing a big power strategy. While it might share much common ground with Chinese objectives, it certainly cannot build a strategic alliance given China's economic expansionism and its refusal to support Brazil's accession to a permanent seat on the Security Council. More generally, beyond China, it is apparent that Brazil's failure in the Iranian case has been instrumental in readjusting Brazilian diplomacy since Dilma Roussef took office. Roussef would like to refocus on Brazil's internal problems and regional roots. Brasilia understands that it does not have an immediate political interest in overexposing itself in areas where Brazil's main interests are not at stake, but where its activism is likely to get it into trouble, especially in relation to the United States. In any case, in the Iranian matter, Brazil was not able to count on either Russia or China when the time came to vote on the third round of sanctions against Iran, as these two countries had already reached an agreement with Washington beforehand⁴¹. As a result, Brazil found itself isolated. It cannot be ruled out that the Russians welcomed this failure with some relief. Indeed, if the Turks and Brazilians had reached a credible and acceptable agreement with Teheran, the Russians and Chinese would have found themselves in the awkward situation of having to explain their alignment with Western positions. Furthermore, the Russians do not want to see an increase in the number of powers outside of the region intervening and thus encroaching on their influence in the P5+1. It is also not impossible that the Obama administration made Brasilia pay the price for its independence by being tepid in its support for Brazil's possible accession to permanent membership in the Security Council. Meanwhile, the U.S. has explicitly supported India's candidacy. India is certainly not an easy partner for the United States, which refers to India as a "sovereignty hawk"⁴². However, India offers resources that Brazil cannot when it comes to counterbalancing China. Obama thus somewhat disappointed the Brazilians, who were probably expecting too much from him anyways⁴³.

³⁹ Interview in L'Estado de Sao Paulo, 17 July 2011.

⁴⁰ The new chief of Brazilian diplomacy, Antonio Patriota, provides insights into the new directions of Brazilian diplomacy under the new presidency, in a subtle speech: Brazil's Minister of Foreign Affairs, Ambassador Antonia de Aguiar Patriota. 31 May 2011. Woodrow Wilson Center for Scholars. Available at: <http://www.wilsoncenter.org/sites/default/files/1310524380-Palestra%2520Min%2520Patriota%2520Wilson%2520Center,%2520FINAL.pdf>.

⁴¹ With regard to the Tehran agreement of 17 May 2010, the former chief of Brazilian diplomacy writes that: "The insistence on sanctions against Iran – effectively ignoring the Declaration of Tehran, and without even giving Iran time to respond to the comments of the "Vienna Group" (the U.S., France and Russia) – confirmed the opinions of many analysts who claimed that the traditional centers of power will not share gladly their privileged status". This interpretation is not false in of itself. However, the chief of Brazilian diplomacy is careful not to explain why China and Russia ended up voting for sanctions against Iran. See: Amorim, Celso. "Let's Hear from the New Kids on the Block." New York Times, 14 June 2010.

The BRICS must be taken seriously because their centrality in the global system is only going to continue to grow in the next years and decades. Yet their existence has both great and contradictory implications. First, they confirm that globalization, far from extinguishing national sovereignties, reinforces them as it transforms them. Second, they show that national sovereignty in the narrow sense of the term cannot be the source of a collective political project. The BRICS share a sovereigntist approach to avoid sharing sovereignty. Their place in the international system should be interpreted in light of this radical ambivalence.

⁴² Interview with Strobe Talbott: "U.S. Interest in Sino-Indian Cooperation." Journal of International Affairs, Spring 2011. Available at: http://findarticles.com/p/articles/mi_hb6705/is_201104/ai_n57429606/.

⁴³ Interviews in Itamaraty, May 2011. Brasilia.