Labour Market Outsiderness and Informal Care Regimes in Europe

Changes in the labour market, in the social structure and welfare retrenchment all contributed to the rise of new social risks, exacerbating the difficulties of work-care reconciliation. At the same time, this political economy context contributed to foster an increasing dualism between labour market insiders and outsiders.

The aim of my project is to better understand the evolution of both labour market insiders' and outsiders' informal caregiving patterns using the pre-crisis context as starting point (since 2006). The research is structured in some steps, using three major international surveys. It will study the effects of outsiderness on labour force participation and wage levels of informal carers in four welfare regimes (Social Democratic, Christian Democratic, Mediterranean and Liberal).
