2 assistant professor positions

<https://econjobmarket.org/positions/8741>

Description

The Department of Economics at Sciences Po invites applications for junior positions (assistant professor, tenure-track) starting September 1, 2023.

For one position, we search for candidates in all fields of economics, with a special focus on public economics, development economics, industrial organization and environmental economics.

The second position, financed by the Mc Court Institute (<https://mccourtinstitute.org/>) is open to candidates with research related to the digital transformation or the economics of new technologies of information and communication. We are particularly interested in candidates investigating how digital technologies impact political and social preferences and access to information.

Candidates are offered a competitive salary package and a light teaching load. Applications from candidates from any country and background are welcome. English is the Department's working language (for teaching as well) and knowledge of French is not required. Sciences Po is an equal opportunity employer, and is committed to balanced gender, geographical, and minority representation. We particularly welcome applications from women.

Interviews will be conducted through the European Job Market virtual meetings held from the 12th to the 14th of December 2022.

Application Instructions

Candidates should have a Ph.D. in hand or firmly expected by August 2023 and should show promise or significant scholarship and teaching ability. A completed application consists of a cover letter, a CV, a copy of important publications or working papers, evidence of teaching performance (if available), and should arrange for the submission of three letters of recommendation. Complete applications should be received by November 14th 2022 to be guaranteed full consideration. All candidates must apply through the online application of EconJobMarket.org.
